

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

An optical wavelength multiplexing apparatus is capable of controlling an attenuation amount of a variable optical attenuator at high
5 speed, thereby preventing an optical level change generated by an upstream WDM section from flowing into a downstream WDM section.

The high speed control is realized by providing a fast-operating local feedback loop for 10 each variable optical attenuator in addition to a slower main feedback loop.